“Green Peacebuilding”: Justice in the face of Climate Change Marisa O. Ensor

Justice and Peace Studies Program & Institute for the Study of International Migration
School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University

What can young activists teach us about peace and climate change?

Climate change has become one of the defining issues of our time. Dr. Ensor shows the people, especially youth, on the front lines of climate change, working to transform their communities to be more resilient and just, even as environmental degradation creates opportunity for conflict.

With a deep background in forced displacement, environmental peacebuilding, humanitarian intervention, and post-conflict justice, Ensor maps the relationship between climate change, conflict and fragile states and the lessons we can learn from those fighting for human rights and peace within their communities.
